Abstract

A method of parsing XML creates type-specific objects for object-oriented applications. The method includes acquiring the XML, associating the XML with a call, calling a code, and creating a type-specific object from the XML because of the code. The association may be implicit or explicit. The type-specific object is an object-oriented object, for example, a Java™ object, a C++ object, or some other object-oriented programming language class.